OF THE PROGRAMMES

POSTGRADUATE STUDIES IN APPLIED ETHICS AT ST AUGUSTINE

St Augustine offers a MPhil in Applied Ethics: in which a student may specialise in either Business Ethics or in Social and Political Ethics.

Applied Ethics involves critical reflection on the interface between ethics and many other areas of human activity. It considers ethical issues, questions and approaches in the social, economic, political and environmental contexts, in both global and national arenas. Applied Ethics asks questions about the ethics of policies, structures and practices in our society and is particularly concerned with questions of justice in the socio-economic-political sphere.

Applied Ethics is a young and exciting academic field of study. Some of the issues that students will explore include: alternative approaches to ethics, ethical dilemmas, the making of ethical judgements, the integration of ethics into our lives in a holistic and meaningful way. For those who enjoy looking at issues through a variety of lenses, asking questions that challenge 'the way things are', and working in an interdisciplinary field, Applied Ethics has much to offer. At the very least, it will encourage us to understand that simplistic answers will not suffice where ethics meets human activity in a 21st century world.

A student registered for the degree must complete seven modules (including core modules and elective modules). The modules are offered during four postgraduate teaching weeks of the academic year (one per quarter). Apart from attending the teaching weeks, a student is required to complete formative and summative assessment tasks in respect of each module. The modules are offered by our permanent academic staff and by guest lecturers from South Africa and abroad.

In addition, a student must complete an 18 000 word Research Project on an approved topic. (Prior to the commencement of the Research Project, a student must complete a Research Methods Workshop.)

The following modules are compulsory for both specialisations:

Dignity of the Human Person	The Module considers the philosophical and theological understanding of what it is to be human and why human beings deserve their rights to be respected.
Foundations of Ethics	The Module asks the question: What is ethics and why is it important? It also examines methods of making moral decisions and dealing with moral dilemmas.
